

On October 21, 2015, Steve Milligan, the Chief Executive Officer of Western Digital Corporation, was interviewed live on CNBC's "Squawk on the Street." A transcript of the interview follows:

David Faber: Speaking of deals by the way, shares of Western Digital this morning actually up, this after its deal to acquire SanDisk for about $19 billion in cash and stock. Of course, it continues a lot of the consolidation we've been seeing generally in the semiconductor industry, specifically in this part of the industry. Here to shed light on some of the details of the deal, Steve Milligan. He's CEO of Western Digital and will be the CEO of the combined company, which will continue to be headquartered in Irvine, California, where they have a lot of traffic, basically, from what I understand. Thank you for making your way to the studio, Mr. Milligan. Let's start off with the deal itself. Why did you want to own, or why did you as leader of Western Digital want to own SanDisk?

Steve Milligan: Well, one of the things that we have done for quite a bit – I mean our story is really all about what we're seeing from a digital data perspective. Today, arguably, Western Digital has the broadest array of digital data storage devices in the market, but there are segments in the market that we have not been able to participate in, and that's really those markets that take advantage of the solid state device and solid state market, and so we wanted to make sure that we had a broad portfolio of products to take advantage of the data explosion that we're seeing in the tech market today.

Faber: Specific to the deal itself and the consideration, of course, investors will note there's this potential two-tier – one in which you obviously share more cash and one in which you don't – in part dependent on the recent investment you announced from Unisplendour. That's leading some to think, well, is that deal not going to happen? So let me ask the question: is that deal in jeopardy of some kind, perhaps as the result of a national security review?

Milligan: No, that – uh – we're very confident in terms of how we're positioned for approval as it relates to the Unisplendour investment. But we do need to get through the regulatory approval process. That will take a little bit of time, but we feel very good about the way that we structured that transaction from a CFIUS process perspective, and we're highly confident that the money will be approved and that the transaction will be approved as part of the process.

Faber: You're talking about as much as $500 million in annual run-rate savings. What gives you the confidence that within 18 months of the close of the deal you can actually get to that number?

Milligan: Well, we've done an extensive amount of analysis as it relates to the SanDisk financial performance. And that analysis, I mean, we've looked at it. We will be able to get cost benefits as it relates to being vertically integrated, as it relates to our enterprise SSD business. And also, we do think that there's some operating expense synergies that we'll realize. So we're highly confident in our ability to realize those $500 million of financial synergies as part of the transaction.

Faber: You know, today we also got some guidance from SanDisk itself. It preannounced what some people are calling sort of mixed results. Not bad on the top line, but people are a bit concerned about their gross margins. Is that a concern at all for you?

Milligan: Well we factored in their current financial performance into our models. They, you know, SanDisk has run into some execution problems on a short term, but we believe that from a long-term perspective, this is a great transaction for us. It's a great transaction for our shareholders. And it's a great transaction for our customers. So, we're very comfortable with the long-term view as it relates to our company and the perspective for the combined company.

Faber: You're going to be running with a decent amount of debt. I think over a 3x leverage ratio. You won't be investment grade. You will de-lever quickly. Any concerns at all in terms of running a somewhat highly leveraged technology company?

Milligan: Well, we evaluated this very carefully. We've, you know, we've been very careful allocators of capital over a number of years, and obviously this is an increased amount of leverage for us, but we're highly confident in our ability to generate free cash flow over time. We'll look to that to quickly de-lever the balance sheet and position us for further growth opportunities as we go forward. So we're very comfortable with the financial terms of the transaction.

Faber: In terms of the overall industry, of course, we hear a great deal about the acceleration of the creation of data. I guess, what, 90 percent of data has been created in the last two years. To what extent is this deal a response to that explosion?

Milligan: Well, it's all a response to that explosion, I mean as I indicated earlier our story over the last several years has all been about how do we take advantage from a company perspective, how do we take advantage from a technology perspective? This explosion that we're seeing from a data perspective – we want to make sure that we have the broadest set of storage devices in the industry. We want to make sure that we've got the best technology. And we want to use that platform to create even more unique devices for our customers and add even more value. And so, fundamentally, this transaction is all about the growth and digital data that all of us are seeing in our personal lives and from a business perspective. So that is really the fundamental thesis behind this transaction.

Faber: You're talking about as late as a third quarter close. That seems an awfully long time for a deal of this nature that doesn't seem to face any significant antitrust hurdles to close. Why give us so much time here in terms of potential when you can close the deal?

Milligan: Well, obviously we're going to look to close the transaction as quickly as we can. But Western Digital, you know, we've run into our own issues in terms of complexities from a regulatory perspective. So, we're obviously being very prudent with our viewpoint from that standpoint. But we're obviously going to look to close the transaction as quickly as we can. Right now our current view is because of the complexity and the size of the transaction and the interactions that we'll have to have with regulators across the globe that we're targeting that the transaction will be cleared and closed in the third quarter of calendar quarter of 2016.

Faber: Mr. Milligan, we've got to leave it there. We appreciate your making your way to the studio and joining us today. Steve Milligan of course, CEO of Western Dig and the combined Western Dig and SanDisk. Thanks for being with us.
